Achieving Family Vision with a Heifer in Bangladesh

22-year-old Mala, her husband and son live in a village in Bangladesh, where most of the villagers are day labourers in their community. "We had to depend on my husband's earnings since there were no alternative income sources," said Mala. "However, with low income my husband could not provide basic needs for our son. We could only manage one meal a day, and sometimes we had to survive on mouldy food." Mala's son became malnourished and she quarrelled with her husband most of the time. Unfortunately, COVID-19 has further deteriorated the condition of the family.

In response to her circumstances, World Vision developed Mala's skills and knowledge on heifer rearing and supported her with a heifer. "Our life is now changing. My child is nourished and we can have three meals a day," said Mala. "We have a dream to educate my child and support him to establish himself in future."

Mala and her family are taking good care of their pregnant cow, and are eagerly waiting to get a healthy calf soon.

Trainees enjoy sewing and starting their own businesses.

Tailor-made for success

In Nepal, with a lack of proper education and technical skills, many women used to work in brick factories, where they were exposed to multiple occupational hazards. Envisioning economic resilience and occupational safety for these women, World Vision supported them with training on tailoring and other skills. "I really enjoy sewing. It is fun and more secure than what I did at brick factories," said Sita. She was supported to open her own sewing shop, in which she started to find a sustainable source of income and make consistent savings. These support also empowers women and offers options for them to make their own living.
